Professional Profile of Scholarship

Christine Vogt is a professor of tourism and recreation studies. She holds a Ph.D. in leisure studies with minors in marketing and sociology survey methods. Her scholarship applies behavioral science to better understand individuals' tourism and recreation planning and decisions. She studies information search processes and decision-making and has narrowed her investigation to consumer information systems, marketing promotions, and natural resource and community planning and development. The research is customer-focused and useful to travel, recreation and community organizations in their creation and management of experiences and attractive places for vacations and residency. The goal of her scholarship is to help increase participation in and the quality of tourism and recreation experiences for all citizens and help Michigan and the Great Lakes region continue to grow sustainable tourism and recreation. She is committed to an internationally recognized tourism and recreation program at MSU that integrates environmental, social, and economic roles in sustainability policies and practices. Her future work will be devoted to community development that fosters human, environmental, economic, and technological innovations.
